This is an infection with inflammation in the pelvic cavity. The infection may spread to the uterus or fallopian tubes. The infections are caused by bacteria, called anaerobes. PID is associated with a number of risks, including severe pelvic pain, ectopic pregnancy, and infertility. If you have PID, it is very important to visit a health care professional as soon as possible. During a pelvic exam, a doctor may find swollen or tender lymph nodes in the pelvis. The doctor will look for a mass or thickened tissue. There may be a discharge of pus from the vagina or the cervix. PID can be diagnosed by a pelvic exam, a Pap test, an endometrial biopsy, or laparoscopy. PID most often results from sexually transmitted infections, especially chlamydia or gonorrhoea. PID is also caused by the presence of an abnormal infection in the vaginal canal due to a procedure that inserts an object into the vagina such as tampon use. It is possible for someone to be infected with both chlamydia and gonorrhoea. This is called dual infection. Women with PID who have gonorrhoea have a higher chance of having the infection
